Expression, purification and characterization of a malate dehydrogenase gene from Streptococcus thermophilus. A malate dehydrogenase gene (mdh) from Streptococcus thermophilus CNRZ385 was cloned, sequenced and overexpressed in Escherichia coli under the control of the T7 promoter. Protein expression was confirmed by SDS-PAGE and Western blotting using monoclonal antibody to malate dehydrogenase from E. coli. The molecular weight of the recombinant protein was estimated to be 45.1 kDa. The enzyme was purified by heat treatment and immobilized metal affinity chromatography, and showed a specific activity of 20.5 U/mg and a yield of 50%. The enzyme was characterized with respect to optimum pH, temperature, stability and substrate specificity. Optimum pH and temperature for the enzyme was 7.4 and 60 degrees C respectively. Optimal pH and temperature were 7.4 and 55 degrees C respectively, with an optimum pH and temperature of 8.0 and 60 degrees C, respectively. The enzyme was stable between pH 5 and 8 and between 30 and 75 degrees C, showing a half-life of 5.2 h at 70 degrees C. Malate dehydrogenase catalyzed the following substrates: D-malate, oxaloacetate and pyruvate. The ability of the enzyme to catalyze these substrates increases in the order of D-malate, oxaloacetate and pyruvate. The activity of the enzyme towards these substrates was diminished in the presence of ammonium acetate. "Lying" was this time of the year in all forms and here are the most interesting ones. Kiri calls the game a lot. This time, in one of the final rounds of the EURO 2013, she managed to convince the Bulgarian judge that it was impossible to reach the next round with the position she had at the end of the game. She would lose on the last move and this way she could play again against the same opponent 82157476af
